While I was in a shop on a busy road, a deafening sound ripped through my ears followed by a huge column of smoke. Soon, I realised that it was a high-decibel firecracker burst to honour a dead man as I saw a long funeral procession moving slowly and flooding the whole road with flowers only to be crushed by speeding vehicles.

While its leading fireworks team fired a blast every five minutes, the shopkeeper whispered, "There is no occasion needed to burst crackers these days. They burn them to celebrate births, to condole deaths, to announce election victories, in wedding processions, at bus stations, and on temple premises and railway platforms without the slightest regard for the law of the land about the restrictions of time and place of their use."

Some are utterly blind to where, when and how to use fireworks without endangering the lives of others. Is there no safer and harmless method to display our sentiments ?

Restrictions to burst firecrackers during festivals imposed by the courts are mostly flouted and it often goes unnoticed by the police. There are specific restrictions on the noise let out by firecrackers measured in decibels.

On that humid morning of August 1975, squatting along the Madras (now Chennai) beach in India, I was looking at a wriggling mass of baby sea turtles in a plastic tub. These tiny turtles, weighing 60-70 grams each, had hatched out of ping-pong ball sized eggs, barely 12 hours ago. These eggs had been kept buried in a makeshift simulated hatchery on the seashore, a little over eight weeks after being collected from the beach, by an optimistic group of reptile-crazy young people from Madras city, led by Romulus and his wife Zai Whitaker.

This group of youngsters had walked along the 50-kilometer seashore from Madras to Mahabalipuram every night, for almost the previous five months, looking for adult female sea-turtles emerging out of sea onto the land to lay eggs. Their modus operandi was simple. As an emerging turtle completed the egg-laying, covered the nest and returned to the sea, the group would open the nest, collect the eggs and move them to a chickenwire-mesh serving as a fenced and covered makeshift hatchery. The eggs were reburied in pits in rows.

The temperature and moisture of each pit was monitored for upto ten weeks. The wriggling mass of baby turtles I was watching was the result of the last batch of such eggs hatching out of the pits and the baby turtles were being taken to the shore to be released back to the sea. Little did I know at that point of time that for the next 20 years sea turtles would become an integral part of my professional career.

On that humid morning of August 1975, squatting along the Madras (now Chennai) beach in India, I was looking at a wriggling mass of baby sea turtles in a plastic tub. These tiny turtles, weighing 60-70 grams each, had hatched out of ping-pong ball sized eggs, barely 12 hours ago. These eggs had been kept buried in a makeshift simulated hatchery on the seashore, a little over eight weeks after being collected from the beach, by an optimistic group of reptile-crazy young people from Madras city, led by Romulus and his wife Zai Whitaker.

This group of youngsters had walked along the 50-kilometer seashore from Madras to Mahabalipuram every night, for almost the previous five months, looking for adult female sea-turtles emerging out of sea onto the land to lay eggs. Their modus operandi was simple. As an emerging turtle completed the egg-laying, covered the nest and returned to the sea, the group would open the nest, collect the eggs and move them to a chickenwire-mesh serving as a fenced and covered makeshift hatchery. The eggs were reburied in pits in rows.

The temperature and moisture of each pit was monitored for upto ten weeks. The wriggling mass of baby turtles I was watching was the result of the last batch of such eggs hatching out of the pits and the baby turtles were being taken to the shore to be released back to the sea. Little did I know at that point of time that for the next 20 years sea turtles would become an integral part of my professional career.

Kitta, in his mid-twenties, was a reserved man. He was a 'Man Friday' for us and a few others in the neighbourhood. He also worked as part-time gardener in one of the nearby factories.

Kitta loved feeding stray dogs. Whenever he came to our area, a pack of dogs would trail him, much to our amusement. A staunch lover of dogs, he never had any fear of being bitten. The way he took pride in feeding the crumbs or food that he would carry in his bag, pouring all his love and affection at the dogs, as he marched with the pack, was indeed a sight to behold.

Whining and moaning of dogs would herald his arrival. Some elderly walkers would grumble, for they were worried about being bitten, especially if rabid ones had strayed into the pack.

At times, the loud barks of the dogs fighting among themselves while he tended to our front lawns annoyed even dog lovers.

One day, we, the employers of Kitta, were served notice by the president of the welfare association of our colony about the stray dog menace and the possible measures to contain it. My neighbours and I could not take exception to it, for the issue had gone beyond our control. We decided to 'do the talking' without hurting Kitta.

A week later, the sudden lockdown that was declared for a month made the matter come down naturally. We did not dare call him after the lockdown too, thanks to COVID-19 that was still looming large.
